MANY AT MEMORIAL SERVICES

Col. Wonson Gave Address in Recognition of the Lost Fishermen.

Water Strewn With Flowers by the Children From Blynman Bridge.

The annual memorial service for men lost at sea, last year, was impressively held at Stage Fort Park yesterday afternoon. The attendance was large, at least 500 people being present, and at the conclusion of the services at the park, the march was returned to the Blynman bridge, where flowers were strewn upon the water by the children in recognition of those who rest beneath the waves.

The party met at the Trinity Congregational church at the corner of School and Middle streets and marched to Stage Fort Park, escorted by a platoon of police and the Acadiana National Band.

Arriving at the band stand in the park, "Jerusalem the Golden," was rendered after which Rev. Charles F. Williams, Ph.D., the president of the institute, stated that the affair was held under the auspices of the Fishermen's Institute, and the principal members participating in the service were officers of the institution.

The roll call of the dead was read by Rev. George Russell the financial agent of the institute.

The president of the institute, Col. Charles F. Wonson, gave the address of the day, after which "Abide with Me" was played by the band and the march was taken up to Blynman bridge, where the flowers were strewn in the water by the children in memory of fishermen who yielded up their lives in their dangerous pursuit. An original hymn, written for the occasion by Miss Mary Brooks, was sung shortly afterwards the march was returned to Middle street, where the procession disbanded.

The Roll of the Dead.

The roll of the dead fishermen read by Rev. George H. Russell is as follows:

It is extremely fitting that here, Gloucester citizens, and our summer residents as well should participate in these last rites for men who have dared and died to maintain Gloucester's material prosperity, and make their unique contribution to the national and world material life.

But their material contribution is their least legacy to us. We need but watch the record from day to day to inform ourselves of the acts of courage and unprecedented heroism which these men perform without thought of pay, in utter disregard of danger. Paramount is their sense of succor; instinctive their life-saving. In the prosecution of different branches of the business, these men cover almost the entire North Atlantic, and never a winter season passes that does not record some rescue of coaster or steamer crew by Gloucester fishermen. It has been reported frequently that coasting vessels and even steamships, have passed signals of distress without offering assistance, but never to my knowledge has any such report been made of a Gloucester fisherman. On the contrary, Gloucester fishermen have made rescues, when even the people in peril have called the attempt impossible and foolhardy, but the judgment, nerve and skill of the Gloucester men, turned the seeming impossible to an assured victory.

"The Story of the Rigel."

In the summer season more than 20 years ago, the steamship "Miranda" sailed from New York on a long voyage of research and discovery. Numbered among her passengers were men, who at that time had won distinction in science, and men who since then have become great in both science and letters.

In cruising along the shores of Iceland, his steamship struck a sunken ledge, and was in danger of sinking. A Gloucester schooner, the Rigel, Capt. George Dixon, was fishing for halibut in those waters. Promptly responding to the call for help, the captain and crew of this fishing schooner took off the passengers and crew of the Miranda, and then attempted to save the steamship by utilizing her to tow the schooner, but she was too badly damaged, sinking in mid-ocean, barely affording time for the volunteer crew to leave her.

The passengers and crew were all safely landed, but the fishing voyage was sacrificed entailing a large monetary loss both to owners and crew. This serves to illustrate the spirit and daring that has always been in our fleet.

Col. Wonson's Address.

The address of Col. Charles F. Wonson, president of the Fishermen's Institute, was as follows:

Col. Wonson's Address.

As is our annual custom, we gather today to pay public tribute to courage and heroism as exemplified by the men who comprise our fishermen, and to hold solemn service for those of them, who have sailed away never to return to this port.

I wish I could present the record of these men in a way, that would appeal to you as it appeals to me. I have hesitated to accept this assignment, to speak, questioning if I could do the subject justice, but as an officer of the Institute, a citizen of Gloucester, and an admirer of courageous rugged manhood, it has seemed my duty to attempt the task.

This fair locality, healthful and invigorating, surrounded by green clad hills, washed at their base by the peaceful and placid waters is Gloucester and Gloucester harbor.

Its location and natural advantages pre-empted it as a fishing station from the earliest settlement, and this it has continued to be for more than 250 years. The Almighty made Gloucester a natural fishing port and gave her the mould of men who have gone on prosecuting the industry with energy and vigor through years of prosperity and years of adversity, through years of war and years of peaceful pursuits, through the summer days and months, when the sea is uniformly placid, and through the days and months of winter, when the storms are almost constant, and the sea is lashed in foam and fury. Through such history has Gloucester passed and still survives as a beautiful and prosperous city, but its prestige has been maintained at an enormous sacrifice of life. It is ex-

Such is a partial record of the men. We are proud to have known them, and for their courage, their loyalty and willing sacrifice we owe them a debt which we but partially cancel when we observe these memorial exercises. Death, so-called will finally claim all of us. It is frequent that unless it touches our own fireside, it affects us but little. We sometimes have friends who in have lived and suffered, and when report of their death reaches us are relieved that their suffering is over. Sickness and death in home, surrounded by comfort and family and loving friends and suffering alleviated by the knowledge of modern science, do not seem to me near so distressing as the sudden and unexpected death by accident or drowning, leaving no time for reflection or preparation. It is one of the purposes of the Institute to instill into these men's principles of right living as will prepare them for the final accounting.

The Fishermen An International Lifeguard.

Those of us who for a lifetime familiar with the record of these men feel that their welfare and preservation is a matter of more than importance. They are a national and international lifeguard, patrolling the broad Atlantic every day in the accepting voluntarily, tasks which even the hardest and most courageous men would hesitate to attempt, less born and bred a fisherman, and I are taxed indirectly for support of life guards through government establishments of life-guarding stations along the coast, and maintenance of revenue cutters. Of these organizations do splendid work in the saving of life and property, but their operations are not necessarily to inshore work, while fishermen cover the routes of inshore and off-shore shipping. It is true that this voluntary patrol is an incident in the prosecution of the fishing industry, yet it confers a public benefit on all people and all nations, and surrounds every man, woman and child who sails the boundless deep, either in sailing vessels or steamship with a dependable guard, which would cost millions maintained by the National Government. They are truly fishers of men in a real sense. Does not such a vice then, deserve the highest appreciation and admiration of this representative throng? Is it not joy as well as duty to provide a helpful influence that is in our power to bestow?

Hoping that these men gone, today hear this our simple, sacred vice of tender memory and gratitude, we think of them as who at call set their house in order and sailed out on the eternal sea God's mercy. Like Browning

SENATE REFUSED FISH AMENDMENTS

Would Not Sanction Continuance of Present Import Duties As Requested by Senator Lodge.

SENATOR HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Whose Amendment to Continue Duties on Fish Was Rejected.

The consideration of several amendments to the tariff bill of especial interest to New England took place in the national senate on Saturday, among them being the proposed amendment continuing the present duties on fish as offered by Senator Lodge, but the senate voted 27 to 36 against accepting the amendments.

The amendment offered by Senator Lodge continued the present duties on kippered herring, fresh and pickled fish, other prepared fish and mackerel.

Senator Lodge made a historical speech on his fish amendment, telling something about the ancient industry and the necessity of some protection.

Senator Lodge quoted Canadian papers to show that free fish would give Nova Scotia fishermen control of the New England market. He declared the Democratic bill gave protection only to the sardine industry of Maine, and left the Grand Banks fishermen of New England at the mercy of their Canadian competitors.
